The pottery found in the 2nd Palace Period, after the earthquake of 1700 BC, started as a development of the Kamares ware. The vivacity of Kamares ware was replaced with a more monumental treatment of nature.

Around 1600 BC, experiments were being made with dark on light decorations. Kamares type ware had floral additions attached on the surface of the vessels. This would serve as a transitional stage between the Kamares and the Floral and Marine pottery styles.

Between 1550 and 1500 BC, the favored patterns on pottery were spirals and leaf shapes - imitating plants and flowers. Thus, this stage in pottery was named, the Floral Style.

By 1500 BC, the Marine Style had evolved. This was one of the finest Minoan pottery styles. During this stage, the entire surface of a pot was covered with images of sea creatures - octopus fish and dolphins against a background of rocks, seaweed and sponges. The Marine style was the last "purely Minoan" style to develop before the Mycenaean invasion of 1450 BC.

The last pottery style in use at the Palace of Knossos was introduced by the Mycenaean conquerors who moved in and repaired the stricken palace. In this new style (Palace Style) earlier motifs were stiffened in rigidity and spontaneity was replaced by grandeur

Bodies and limbs were represented by triangles. Thousands of brush strokes were applied to cover the entire surface of the vase with figures, rosettes, meanders, cross hatching and spirals. The design was arranged in horizontal bands. Painting on the natural ceramic color with a lustrous brown glaze, as had been the case with the Minoan vases, created the decoration. Statuettes or birds or horses or miniature vases were often used for handles to the lids

CORINTHIAN STYLE VASES

The stylized geometric lines gave way to animal and human figures with rounded contours and considerable animation. Figures such as those that might have been found on Eastern rugs and textiles were dominant in a rhythmic design of floral patterns and dots and rosettes filling the entire background.

BLACK-FIGURED STYLE VASES

In this style the figures were painted in black on the reddish orange surface. Details within the silhouetted figures were incised before firing.

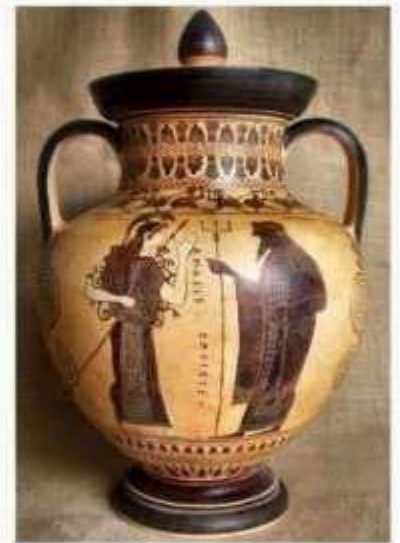

Occasionally white or purple was added to the figure with the female flesh usually painted white. Human figures drawn with greater skill appeared as elements of the principal design. The stories were drawn by myths, the Trojan wars, the adventures of Odysseus, the other great heroes of mythology, the capering satyrs and maenads in the retinue of Dionysus.

RED-FIGURED STYLE VASES

No 715 Side A
H. 59cm

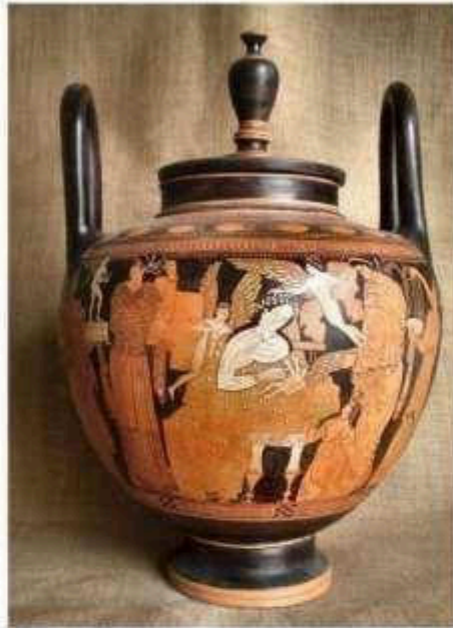

No 715 Side B
H. 59cm

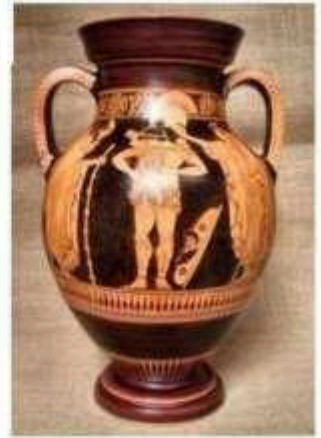

When realism became an objective the style was limited. The silhouetted and incised drawings were basically two-dimensional, giving the human form that kind of quality that was present in the sculptures of the same archaic period. The decoration was first outlined in black. The surface of the vase outside the design was then painted black, leaving the design in the lighter reddish color of the undecorated vase. Details were then added with a fine brush applying black or diluted black, which appeared as brown after the refining.
